Dear Senators Murray, Enzi, Harkin, and Isakson:

This letter comes to you on behalf of CAAL and members of the National Commission on Adult Literacy. We want to thank you for your leadership in reauthorizing the Workforce Investment Act (WIA) and bringing about needed improvements in adult education and workforce development.

The Commission’s report, Reach Higher, America: Overcoming Crisis in the U.S. Workforce (2008), noted that other nations are fast outstripping America in boosting the educational levels of their young and their working-age adults, endangering our global competitiveness. This is alarming for the future of our economy because educational levels relate to employment levels and income.

Nearly half of U.S. workers aged 18-64 either have no high school diploma, or a high school diploma but no college, and/or low English and basic skills proficiency. If we fail to educate new workers from these adult ranks, large numbers of them will become a drain on the economy rather than a positive economic force. As the Commission’s report makes clear, there will be large fiscal and social gains from providing the needed services, and they will more than offset the human resource investments made now.

As your leadership has acknowledged, we must build a strong adult education system if we are to overcome unemployment, achieve national economic growth, compete effectively in the global economy, and ensure that Americans reach and succeed in college and job training programs so they will qualify for current and emerging jobs.

We are so pleased that you recognize that millions of out-of-school adults rely on the Adult Education system, and that this system with its WIA-envisioned improvements is essential if the economy is to prosper in the 21st century and if Americans are to reach their full potential. Your WIA bill takes a major step in redefining the basics by providing a framework that upgrades traditional skills services and planning for basic reading, writing, math and numeracy, and oral communication. Equally important, it also expands the adult education and workforce development system to teach skills such as communication, critical thinking, research capabilities, problem solving, and working in teams – all imperative if adult education is to result in gaining and keeping a job.
Your WIA bill recognizes that the status quo is not an option. We must do very much better in providing instructional services through workforce development programs, community-based organizations, school districts, the workplace, community colleges, and other venues.

The bill is extremely well conceived and informed. It provides solid policy and funding support for both integrated and sequential programs; recognizes the important role of the private sector, educators, adult education service providers, and other stakeholders; and provides new, firm guidelines to ensure comprehensive planning that will result in well-directed and effective program services and make the best use of available resources. It also offers employers incentives to provide basic skills services for incumbent workers, including workplace programs. We are extremely pleased by the bill’s strong assessment and accountability measures.

We also applaud your recognition of the role that technology must play in educating our adult workforce, for without substantially more use of technology and distance learning, the nation cannot serve substantially more learners in a cost-effective way.

We recognize that much can be accomplished through system integration and alignment and through the greater use of technology. But it is also true that investment in the Adult Education system, and the workforce system in general, has declined in real terms in recent years. We simply must invest more if we are to reach the almost 90 million Americans who have at least one education barrier blocking their readiness for admission to and success in college and jobs.

We look forward to working with you to achieve the passage and enactment of your bill and to secure the funds necessary to reach those working Americans who will benefit from Adult Education and workforce skills upgrading.

Sincerely,

Gail Spangenberg
